*South Korea: In an effort to stabilize South Korea's deteriorating political situation, junta leader Pak Chung-hui has offered to withdraw from politics and to lift the ban on former political leaders.

Pak announced yesterday that he would not participate in the proposed civilian government if all political leaders agreed by 23 February to his published list of principles governing political activity.

If Pak follows through with his plans, which include postponing the elections scheduled for April and May, political maneuvering among rival candidates would become more intense and might threaten the emergence of a stable civilian government. Pak might then be encouraged to try to reassert his authority or to accept a "draft" as presidential candidate.

Iran: The reshuffle of the Iranian cabinet on 18 February appears to be a move to strengthen the administration. No dissension within the cabinet has been reported, but the Shah may have ordered the shifts in an attempt to keep his reform program rolling and to develop greater confidence among the business community.
